

For Your Consideration...

I wanted to send you a message expressing my concerns about how new legislation would put more power in the hands of ISPs and how I believe regulation is a necessity when thinking about what comes next with the Internet and net-neutrality.

I'm of a generation that has grown up hand in hand with the Internet. I was born in 1989 and am very familiar with the evolution of this world-changing connectivity that is the World Wide Web.

I'm worried that being hands-off in the regulation, restrictions, and operations would leave a lot of grey area for companies to benefit themselves and not have to own or offer up the choices they make and why they make them, and the results those decisions have on each companies shareholders and their competitors.

I'm optimistic about this current administration's position to enact change across all avenues on The Hill; they can do a lot of good in how they choose to lead this nation forward.

But I believe that this change is a threat to open enterprise and would make the marketplace volatile for companies and consumers alike.
